Advancing
Universal Design

The University of Arizona is committed to creating a welcoming and inclusive campus for all students, employees and visitors and values the richness that disabled individuals bring to our community.

Disability Resources leads the University in pursuit of a well-designed and accessible campus through consultation, collaboration, service coordination, and extra-curricular programming. We promote a view of disability that has evolved from the disability rights movement, is explored by Disability Studies scholars, and places disability in social, cultural and political contexts. Using this model, we view disability as an aspect of diversity and explore access through the redesign of campus environments using the principles of universal design. We provide individual support, including academic adjustments and reasonable accommodations, while striving to create environments that provide meaningful access to all individuals who use the University and its resources.

Disability Resources staff is available to the 45,000+ members of our campus community and each year works individually with over 1,700 individuals with disabilities.
